Progressively supranuclear palsy (PSP) is a neurodegenerative disease that involves postulated dysfunction of the basal ganglia. Abnormal deposits of phosphorylated tau protein were described in the brain of most PSP patients. Here, we have examined the brain for the presence of beta-amyloid peptide and have found no evidence of its deposition in these patients. This is the first study to examine the brains of patients with PSP with immunohistochemical methods and antibodies against the amyloid peptide and tau. Brain samples were obtained at autopsy from six patients with PSP and three control cases with no neurological disease. Paraffin-embedded tissue sections were stained with antibodies against the amyloid peptide, tau, or both tau and amyloid peptide. No immunoreactivity to any of the antibodies was detected in neurons in the brains of PSP patients, although tau immunoreactivity was present in the axons of several small nerve cells. There was no evidence of amyloid deposition.⁵ Delicious Ways To Be Healthy If you're trying to eat a healthier diet, it's not that hard to do.
